His last illness was not of long continuance, nor was it attended with suffering, either mental or corporeal. To death itself he had ever expressed a perfect indifference, though he was anxious to be spared a painful or protracted exit; a wish in which he was fortunately gratified. He died in his house in Craven Street, with all the calmness of a philosopher, on the 24th December, 1839, in the sixtyfifth year of his age, and was buried in the vaults of St. Martins church. LINES ON THE DEATH OF JAMES SMITH, ESQ. BY A LADY. The tomb has closed oer him who once was the light Of each circle where talent and temper are loved; Whose varied acquirements as solid as bright More fondly we love, when for ever removed. His memorys wide-speaking compass could span, Like the rainbows bright arch, the horizon of mind. Oer the billows of Time reminiscent it ran, And the stores of the past to his grasp were resigned. The coldness of form and the shadows of gloom Were chased by the beams of his fancys light play; His voice sent the sspirit of mirth round the room, And his laugh drove the demon of dulness away. How oft, when his presence our meetings has cheered, Have the young and ingenuous thronged round his seat, To share in the converse his kindness endeared, (Sure test of His worth whom such suffrages greet.) No maxim has guided--no learning directs, The Bee on her task among summers gay bowers; From instinct alone she unerring selects The sweetest and best for her banquet of flowers: So, by natures mysterious alchemy led, The young, yet unsnared in the mazes of art, Can detect the pure ore wheresoeer it lies hid, And a smile gives them light to decipher the heart! Content to be loved where he might have ...
